

IDAHO
HERITAGE
TRUST

ANNUAL REPORT 2021

In 2021, the Idaho Heritage Trust awarded $214,525 to 31 separate preservation projects, which helped enable our grantees to raise an additional $692,625 in matching funds to complete their projects. Despite facing many of the same challenges that persisted from 2020, we received an incredible number of applications for our Heritage Grants, showing yet again the enduring passion to protect and preserve Idaho's cultural and historic treasures to be enjoyed for generations to come. In order to meet this near-record demand for funding, our board authorized a 40% increase in total dollars awarded over the previous year, leading to eight additional projects receiving grant assistance this cycle. In addition, we provided $61,000 in Technical Assistance for historical architecture, engineering, and conservation consultation.

"Every grant cycle gives us a chance to make an impact in every region of our state," says Donna Woolston, Chairperson of IHT's Board of Trustees, "Being able to support projects in both our cities and some of our smallest, most precious communities each year is a unique opportunity and privilege." This was especially important in 2021, as so many of our smaller communities are suffering economic hardship and seeing their demographics rapidly change. We believe historic preservation is not only an integral part of protecting our history and culture, but also an important means to create new jobs, stimulate heritage tourism, and increase civic pride and engagement.

This year also saw the completion of several impactful projects in the old mining town of Bayhorse. In 2017 and 2018, the Trust awarded grants to reroof the Bayhorse Hotel, Sullivan House, and Wells Fargo Building, each of which were in danger of imminent collapse. Repointing the masonry of the Wells Fargo Building was also completed this year, ensuring these fixtures of one of Idaho's few remaining mining towns will remain intact to inform and inspire for many more years to come.

2021 was a year of great growth and progress for the Idaho Heritage Trust over and above our increase in grants awarded. We launched a new Grant Portal that helped simplify all aspects of the grant process, welcomed two new Trustees to our Board, and engaged the services of a second Historic Architect to help with our Technical Assistance and Grant Review programs. IHT also built upon the recent launch of our new website by increasing our social media engagement and providing periodic highlights on stories and projects of particular interest and significance.

We look forward to building on these successes in the coming year by developing new grant programs, strengthening our cooperative partnerships with other similar organizations, and finding new and innovative ways to champion the preservation of Idaho's cultural resources.

Sincerely,

Katherine Kirk
